Excerpt: . . . parchment Grew dazzling to his gaze, -There, in its very centre-Among a host of rays-A hand of wondrous beauty Before the scribe was laid, -The letters paled beneath it, He saw the ink-streams fade. That hand! no pulse was beating Under its silvery hue, While, in the gloom beside him, The quaking clerk could trace A human outline bending---A womans pleading face! A form of moonlike brightness, . -Clothed in an opal mist, A face like wan, white flowers, No sunbeam ever kissed; She lookd so strangely distant, And yet she felt so near; Vague, in her shadowy lustre, -Fair, but a thing of fear! Her voice--the young clerk heard it--And with his heart he heard, Those tones the founts of being In their deep centre stirrd! I am that young childs mother, Him thy swift pen would wrong, The angels took me early--Earth did not own me long. The love I bear my first-born Was lulld by death to sleep--The bud lies in the dark seed Till summer dewes shall weep; Till summer suns shall wake it Clad in triumphant bloom, The light of God awaiting. i My love slept in the tomb. Lo! in the dim old chancel In holy trance I lie, The lights and shades flit oer me As days--months--years, pass by; The first red glow of morning Creeps up the long aisles gloom, To shield thy sons birthright. I felt the love within me Kindle, and thrill, and glow,...
