I. c. vii. at any time come to us, and thy needs shall be supplied. He then ordered some sheep to be killed and given to the robber in place of the seals, that he might not return empty. A short time after, the saint saw in spirit that the death of the robber was at hand, and he ordered Baithen, then steward in Tiree, to send a fat sheep and six pecks of corn as a last gift. Baithen sent them at once, but found that the robber had died suddenly the same day, and the presents were used at his burial. Divine service was held morning and evening, in which the members were required to join, except those employed on the farm, whose fatigue after labour would probably demand unbroken sleep at night. Fasting was enjoined, in which, it is said, Columba was incessantly engaged night and day in the unwearied exercise, and often the burden of these austerities seemed beyond the power of human endurance. Every Wednesday and Friday, except between Easter and Whitsuntide, was a fast day, and no food was partaken of before three o'clock in the afternoon. The principal service was the celebration of the Holy Communion which took place on the Lord's day (dies Dominica). It...
