Stead, of the London Review of Reviews and Senator Benjamin Tillman of South Carolina In presenting this pamphlet to the public, I think a few prefatory remarks are needed in order to call the attention of my readers to the national and international reputation of the men to whom I addressed open letters, in the hope that we might publicly debate the question of the white man's dealings with colored races under British and American rule. Mr. W. T. Stead, editor of the Review of Reviews (London, England), is without doubt the leading journalist in the world. Not only is Mr. W. T. Stead a fluent and voluminous writer, but he is a brilliant and an eloquent conversationalist and public speaker. Besides the enormous number of daily newspapers, weekly and monthly magazines and reviews for which Mr. Stead has written, he is the well known author of hundreds, and perhaps it would be no exaggeration to state, thousands of pamphlets...
